Introduction 1907.

This first volume of Little Sketches of Big Folks presents to the reader short sketches of unadorned facts of about 3,000 of the representative men of the State of Minnesota. There has been no attempt made to eulogize, no useless expenditure of adjectives, no effort at "write up," and no editorial opinions expressed. Each sketch is a brief compilation of facts that are of public record, and as such is wholesome and refreshing.

The data for these sketches has been gathered from the subjects themselves: they have been personally interviewed in city, town, and village, and every effort has been to insure accuracy. It has been no light task to select first the names, and then to secure proper data for the biographies; it has been a long and arduous work and its consummation is here offered without misgiving of its cordial reception on the part of the public.

Minnesota as a state is not half a century old, yet its people have been so occupied with home making and business building that but little thought has been given to the history that is being made; records have been carelessly kept; records that in the next generation will be of the greatest value to the sons and daughters of the active men of to-day.

There is as yet but a young generation of Minnesotans; the men of to-day who have done, and are doing things, are for the greater part natives of other states and countries; they came here from the four quarters of the globe, first a few, then a multitude, and from out of an almost unknown territory they have built a great state; they came as strangers to one another, each unknown to the other save for the knowledge gained from neighborly and friendly intercourse. It is of these men, some old, some young and but comparatively recent arrivals, that these sketches are written, that who and what they are, may be compiled in one volume. With this intent, the work has been published; that the thoughtful man may have at hand a comprehensive history of Minnesota told in few words; a history of the people who have contributed their finest effort to the glory and prestige of this state, for: "The history of a nation is the biography of its men."

The purpose has been to confine its pages to living men; pilots, captains and engineers of professional, financial, and commercial progress, that some really intelligent and effective record might be had in permanent form, of Minnesota and its people on the semi-centennial of its birth as a state.

Soon many of those herein will be gone. It is then that this work will begin to assume a still greater value; and as each year goes by, and the names of the living in these pages grow fewer in number, so will its value continue to increase. But even to-day it has a value all its own. As a whole it will be found to be a work of reference unlike, and more complete than anything hitherto attempted; as a special reference it has a value separately for each man in each of the several walks in life, for it contains the sketches of the men in his own particular vocation with whom he is familiar either personally or by name. Perhaps its utility could scarce be more comprehensively expressed than in the words of Dr. Warren Upham, Secretary and Librarian of the Minnesota Historical Society, who writes in a letter dated March 21, 1907:

"This publication, giving short biographic sketches of Minnesota citizens, will be exceedingly useful for supplying quick and accurate answers to questions that arise daily or hourly in the experience of all who are extensively engaged here in business, the professions, journalism, or any work requiring acquaintance with the people of the state."
